Andrea Cecil

As Boisey Neal left Phillips seafood restaurant, he raised his eyebrows, cracked a smile and noted that sitting down with a reporter was the first interview of his life not involving hot lights shining on his face and questions starting with "Where were you on the night of"

The 36-year-old spent nearly two decades in and out of prisons in four states -- the last stint being at the Maryland House of Correction in Jessup -- for armed robberies.

"Every day was a struggle," he said of life behind bars. "It was a struggle to stay alive."

And so was born the name of his company: Struggle Enterprise -- co- owned and operated by his 37-year-old wife, Tonia, who also spent much of her lifetime staring at the apathetic walls of correctional facilities. Under the name, the two operate four businesses: truck and tanker washing, car detailing, the cleanup of diesel-fuel spills, and the production and sale of chemicals used to clean trucks and tankers.

Struggle Truck and Tank Washer Service now boasts about $14,000 in revenue each month, Boisey Neal said.

"That's success," he said. "We came from people committing carnage to this."

But it did not come easy for the two, who are still in the process of reorganizing and streamlining their businesses. The couple is most heavily concentrating on their truck and tanker cleaning service.

"We started with nothing. Nobody helped us. Nobody financed us," Tonia Neal said. "It was just one big ordeal after another."

Hurdles to jump

The first problem the Neals encountered was simply getting their truck and tanker washing service up and running late last year. However, after $10,000 rolled in during the first two months, it soon began to disappear by the hands of dishonest employees, they said.

It was then that the two fired everyone and were left with not only being the bosses, but also the employees.

The Neals worked 16-hour shifts -- cleaning asphalt, grease and tar, among other things, from the insides of trucks and tankers -- to compensate. Tonia Neal did so while she was pregnant, and likewise, suffered from a miscarriage.

"Things have been better," Boisey Neal said. "You know, you have to fail to succeed."

Craig Eldridge, manager of Baltimore-based Fleet Transit, has been working with Struggle and the Neals for almost two years.

The Neals are dependable, get along well with others and listen to criticism, he said.

"All in all, I think they've done pretty well for being pretty new," Eldridge said. "If they continue to listen to [people in the industry], they can continue to grow. That's the only thing they can do is move up."

Struggle has no formal ad campaign -- only word of mouth and free demonstrations.

"Your work should be your advertisement," Boisey Neal said.

Plus, Struggle offers a full car detail for $399 and will clean a fleet of 60 for $25 per truck, he said.

"The reason it's so cheap is because you'll get repeat service," Neal said. "We're trying to revolutionize the business."

The Neals now have six employees to help them clean trucks and tankers, as well as oil and diesel-fuel spills in the state, but are searching for more trained employees to grow their business.

Empower Baltimore Management Corp., a nonprofit organization aiming to increase community and economic development, has been working with Struggle to help the company find and train potential workers.

"Right now, we are analyzing what their needs are," said Ann Bostic, director of Empower Baltimore's Workforce Development, a program that includes an ex-offender-to-work initiative.

The Neals, being ex-convicts themselves, said the idea is one they fully support.

"We are really interested in helping people, like ex-offenders, who may not have the educational background, but still have the driving desire," Tonia Neal said. "It's not how much you know, but how much you're willing to learn. I don't need someone with a bachelor's degree to clean my trucks."

"The reason it's so cheap is because you'll get repeat service. We're trying to revolutionize the business."
